Dynastic tendencies in suicide attempts in children and adolescents: a comparison of two national, population-based data sources. The present study describes the tendency of psychiatric inpatients to be admitted to hospital with suicide attempts with the two major modalities of suicide attempt in the two most recent years in a national Norwegian data base (1984-88) and compares these data with those from a UK study conducted in the same period. The Norwegian data show that girls (except those under 12 years of age) were more likely than boys to attempt suicide by poisoning or hanging and that attempts by means of both the main modalities were most common in young males. The UK data, on the other hand, show that attempts by means of poisoning were most common in both sexes, and that the young group was mainly comprised of girls. The reasons for the differences between the two countries in this respect are examined, and some suggestions for how to proceed in increasing our knowledge about the suicide attempt problem and its causes in children and adolescents are offered.

Renal effects of the metabolic syndrome: influence of genetic background. Syndrome X (the metabolic syndrome) comprises a constellation of cardiovascular risk factors that include increased insulin resistance, elevated blood pressure, central obesity, impaired glucose tolerance, and dyslipidemia. The Framingham Heart Study demonstrated that 30-40% of women and 20-30% of men with the metabolic syndrome have elevated blood pressure
